Spotlight: Angel Reese, Miami Heat's Naming Rights, and the Future of Artificial Intelligence in Entertainment

Welcome back to the Spotlight! With the Spring holidays in swing and many on Spring Break, I will be brief as I realize reading sports and entertainment business and legal stories may be the Easter your worries. But I couldn't Passover an opportunity to check-in. Yikes, those were pretty bad – even for my standards. In any event, I will be off on vacation next week, during which time I can perhaps come up with better material. But for now, your Easter egg/Afikomen prize is below:

- Angel Reese has been the topic of much discussion with regard to sportsmanship and implicit bias following her LSU Tigers' Basketball National Championship victory over the Iowa Hawkeyes. Over all the noise, she has become a household name and the "Bayou Barbie" has positioned herself to buy that dream home.
- IT and Security Management firm Kaseya secures naming rights to the Miami Heat's NBA Arena, becoming a successor to cryptocurrency exchange turned criminal enterprise FTX. But the heat still remains on Miami shooting guard Jimmy Butler, who is facing legal action over his ties to crypto exchange Binance.
- Artificial Intelligence may hold the power to keep celebrities entertaining long beyond their natural lives. In a related story, Dick Clark's New Year's Rockin' Eve 2024 will be hosted by Dick Clark with musical performances by Elvis Presley and Ludwig von Beethoven.
