Partner Alexandra Meise was quoted in the article, "Justices To Weigh Corporate Liability In Terror Connections," published by Law360 on October 10, 2017. The article discusses a case over a Jordanian bank's alleged ties to Palestinian militant groups could provide one of the first hints of the justices' views on corporate liability for terror financing, human rights abuses and other violations of international law, experts say.

From the article:

"Beyond that threshold of whether corporations can be held liable, the court could look to clarify the key question of just when an international incident sufficiently touches and concerns the U.S. to allow for jurisdiction. The court left that question open in the Kiobel decision, said Alexandra Meise, a partner with Mitchell Silberberg & Knupp LLP."
