Overview

Jessica Keyes (she/her) has long known she wanted to be an attorney and work alongside those in the medical field. The more she learned throughout her studies, the stronger the desire became to use her voice and knowledge to support those who do not have a seat at the table. With over a decade of legal experience, she now focuses her practice on providing high-level legal counsel on complex health care issues across the public and private sectors.

As partner in Amundsen Davis's Health Care Service Group, Jessica represents a variety of health care clients facing issues such as reimbursement, eligibility, enrollment, and provision of services. Her innate curiosity is highlighted in how she approaches client relationships; she dives into the relevant background as much as possible to gain a thorough understanding of the issues at hand and those that may present themselves in the future.

As a former attorney and general counsel for a state health and human services agency, she has a deep understanding of state and federal regulatory compliance, policy creation and implementation, legislation, and litigation strategy for medical, aging, mental health, and disability services. She strategically analyzes risks to ensure compliance with regulations and has a track record for successfully representing her clients and securing favorable outcomes in court and mediation.
