Frank is a versatile commercial litigator. As a member of the Washington, D.C., California, and New York bars, he focuses on cases at the intersection of government regulation, technological innovation, and financial markets.

Frank represents companies, executives, boards of directors, trade associations, political organizations, and nonprofits in litigation, arbitration, investigations, and government enforcement actions. He has successfully tried cases, won appeals, and secured favorable dismissals and settlements in bet-the-company matters and complex, high-stakes litigation across the country.

Frank regularly assists clients with novel developments in law and technology, including matters concerning crypto, AI, blockchain, smart contracts, data centers, robocalling, fintech, and financial products and derivatives. He also has significant experience handling commercial and securities litigation, investigations, and regulatory proceedings involving financial transactions, mergers and acquisitions, corporate governance issues, shareholder derivative claims, breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duties, fraud, government contracts, and antitrust issues. He often litigates against the DOJ, SEC, FTC, FCC, and state AGs.

In addition to his active litigation practice, Frank teaches legal writing and oral advocacy at The George Washington University Law School.
